

Monthly review

In April, global equity markets recorded a strong rally, supported by early signs of easing tensions in the Gulf, allowing for a full recovery of the losses observed in the previous month. In the United States, performance was underpinned by a resilient macroeconomic backdrop, alongside renewed interest in the technology sector, including selected Mag7 names, and the continued advancement of long-standing AI-related trends. The outlook in Europe remains more uncertain, given the region's higher exposure to geopolitical and energy-related developments. Nevertheless, European equity markets also posted a solid recovery, albeit still lagging other major global regions. Toward the end of the month, the earnings season brought investor focus back to corporate fundamentals, with results broadly coming in solid. Earnings from hyperscalers, more positive for Alphabet and Amazon, more mixed for Meta and Microsoft, confirmed the strength of the AI theme, with ongoing improvements in monetization and return on invested capital. Capex by these companies, which continues to increase and remains not fully priced in, has disproportionately benefited semiconductors and industrial companies exposed to the theme. Throughout the month, several portfolio adjustments were implemented to take advantage of the evolving dynamics driven first by the conflict and subsequently by the earnings season. In the early part of the month, exposures that had benefited from the uncertain geopolitical backdrop, such as Exxon, BP and Shell, were reduced following initial signs of de-escalation, while positions that had been penalized in the prior period despite solid fundamentals were increased, including both European and U.S. banks. In the latter part of the month, as uncertainty around the trajectory of the conflict re-emerged, positioning shifted toward structurally stronger themes such as AI-related capex. Exposure was increased to names such as TSMC, Quanta Services, Micron, Texas Instruments and Amazon, alongside new positions in Lumentum and Coherent. At the same time, exposure to sectors more sensitive to elevated energy prices was reduced, including aerospace (GE, Safran, Rolls-Royce, Airbus) and selected consumer names such as L'Oréal. Finally, ahead of the earnings season, certain positions with limited catalysts and lower upside were reduced, including Microsoft, Nvidia and Union Pacific, while the position in SAP was fully exited in light of potential risks to its business model that could lead to negative revisions.
