

Monthly review

In March 2026, bond markets experienced a significant increase in volatility, triggered by the geopolitical escalation in the Gulf, which significantly impacted investor sentiment. Core rates showed more erratic movements, with an initial decline linked to the search for safe-haven assets, followed by phases of rebound amid uncertainty about the inflation outlook, also in light of the possible repercussions on energy prices. Credit spreads widened, particularly in higher-beta segments, reflecting a more cautious stance and reduced risk appetite. The macroeconomic environment became more complex: while global growth continued to show some resilience, new geopolitical tensions introduced downside risks and increased uncertainty about the future trajectory of inflation. In the United States, the Federal Reserve has maintained a cautious approach, emphasizing that the environment requires flexibility and attention to exogenous inflation risks, implicitly scaling back expectations of rapid monetary easing. In some countries, especially those that are net importers of hydrocarbons, the approach will need to be more pragmatic, initially factoring in rising inflation. Given this scenario, we have adopted a more defensive approach within the Fund, decisively adjusting duration and reducing exposure to Asia, including reducing exposure to Indonesia.
