

Monthly review

In May 2026, bond markets were characterized by persistent upward pressure on yields, triggered by stronger-than-expected macroeconomic data on the labor market and consumption, which significantly impacted investor sentiment. Core rates showed a marked upward trend, with long-term government bonds impacted by the delay in the first-interest rate cuts, amid renewed concerns about the rigidity of the services component of core inflation. Credit spreads remained largely resilient despite slight volatility, particularly in high-yield segments, reflecting general confidence in the solidity of corporate balance sheets but also greater selectivity in issuance. The macroeconomic environment remained solid but polarized: while global manufacturing activity showed signs of stabilizing, strong domestic demand introduced risks of overheating and increased uncertainty about the speed of the disinflation process. In the United States, the Federal Reserve has adopted a decidedly more hawkish rhetoric, emphasizing that the path to the 2% target will take longer than expected and that rates will remain tight until there is clear evidence of a cooling in prices. In some countries, especially those that are net importers of hydrocarbons, the approach will need to be more pragmatic and, initially, rising inflation will need to be taken into account. Given this scenario, we have adopted a more defensive approach to the Fund, maintaining duration underweight by almost a year, increasing exposure to countries expected to benefit from the Gulf crisis, such as Brazil, and reducing exposure to Asia, Indonesia in particular.
